Allen—Claude M. Lennon—Warfield & Allen—Claude M. Lennon—Warfield & Chicago he of 501 weight. BONI, THE SWELL OF SWELLS. house John, of Chicago, he of 501 waistcoats and trouse of dazzling splendor, fade and become as nothing when the wardrobe of Count Boni Castellane passes in review. Let it be known that of the fourteen Castellane trunks landed from the French liner La Bretagne at New York recently, five, the biggest of the bunch, held naught but the purple and fine linen of the Count. The Countees was modestly content with seven trunks of moderate size.

There is one popular fallacy in connection with the Count. The idea that he is a little chap is all wrong. The Count stands full 5 feet 10 inches, and, thanks to his tailor, sports a pair of padded shoulders that even Sharkey n ght envy. Count Boni's afternoon or calling cosume is probably the most effective in his entire repertoire. It simply drives all would-be imitators to despair.

The frock coat that goes with this is made of black, wiry, broad-welt diagonal, cut with long skirts, which fall at least three inches below the knee. The shoulders are broad and daintly puffed above the arms, much as in fash ionable sacques for women.

From the broad shoulders the garment cuts sharply in at the waist, then flares out into long spreading tails, like the skirts of a premiere danseuse. High up on the left breast is a long pocket from which bulges a white handker-

The Ascot necktie is scarlet, figured in white and puffed to a bewildering degree. With the frock coat goes a pair of trousers of large black and white chack—very white and very black—out of trousers of large black and white check—very white and very black—out wide and flowing from waist to just above the instep. Here they narrow sarply, only to bell out again in a bold sarply for Headaches. Neursigia, and sarply patent leathers visitiveled remedy for Headaches. Neursigia, and sarply patent leathers visitively for the count's tiny patent leathers visitively.

Troy in her palmiest days never turned out its like. It baffles description. It s anchored to the shirt somewhere above the waist line. It mounts up edges beneath his flaming locks. Two broad white wings spread out over a wide expanse of bosom and hide their tips within the recesses of a waistcoat

The Count's favorite morning suit is a four-button sack, which once seen can never be forgotten. It is not so much a matter of cut as of fabric in the case of this suit. The color is a deli-cate fawn, crossed and recrossed by wide stripes of deep sea green. A flowing silk bow-knot of maroon picked out in blue figures goes with this block, for the morning; a glittering silk hat of no individuality for afternoon, and the regulation crush for evening.

In overcoats Count Boni makes, probably, his strongest hit. These garments —and he has several of them—are all of the same pattern, very long and richly

Report has it that for one of these coats, lined throughout with choice Russian sable, $9,000 was expended. To the uneducated eye, however, these garments appear almost commonthese garments appear almost common-place. They are cut tight to the Count's figure, show a plain cloth ex-terior, and look as if they might have cost $45 each. This, of course, until the Count carelessly throws the coat open, revealing its interior elegance.

Count Boni's full dress is something of a disappointment. The dress shirt, however, is both unique and beautiful.
It is made of thick linen with a twilled surface, the bosom soft and neglige, with one wide plait, delicately ruffled at the
